Companies developing transparent OLEDs already have proven techniques for creating deep-blue light emitting diodes. Many have also succeeded in achieving blue LEDs with low efficiency but additional barriers exist to create large-area, low-cost devices and display. "The researchers met that challenge with a multilayer transparent OLED. They fabricated it by depositing a microstructured electroluminescent polymer and doped nanoparticles on a glass substrate. By alternating different layers, the polymer can effectively absorb green and red light, so it emits only blue light. Although the efficiency is low, the process can be done with existing materials and equipment. The team is now scaling up the process and improving efficiency. "The research demonstrates how a new type of transparent electroluminescent polymer can be used in a device that significantly improves the efficiency of the blue-emitting channel," said James Hone, assistant professor of materials science and engineering at the University of California at Santa Barbara." Researchers have long searched for an optically transparent conductor with low electrical conductivity, and have found it most readily in the indium-tin oxide (ITO) that's commonly used as the transparent electrode on the front side of an OLED device. ITO, however, produces undesired optical effects. Instead, the team turned to an undoped electroluminescent polymer used for producing tun
