
make sure you have a good understanding of what Your hardware is, where it's located (internal or external), and what it's specifications are. For example: model name, model number, specifications number/name (such as 250HD or UD-M250HD), version number (say 3.0.0.18 for example), and if it's an internal card, which slot it's placed in. It is vital that you understand the various different types of cards in your computer and where they are located. Where Do I get help A: What you are describing is almost certainly a problem with your firmware. Basically the firmware in the motherboard is what interacts with the operating system and the software that you installed (including the OS itself, any drivers etc.) when you turn your computer on. When you say "it doesn't work" what you are essentially saying is: "The firmware on my motherboard is causing a problem, but I do not know what the problem is" It is possible to debug the firmware directly. This is actually extremely easy on a PC, and almost the same on a Mac, the steps for each are as follows: Insert a Windows 8, Windows 7 or Windows 10 install CD. Boot from CD. When asked to choose a language, choose English (United States), it should say so in the upper left corner e79caf774b
